Abstract

Nationalism prioritizes national interest which is essential to the functioning of democratic societies. Globalization represents universalism and envisages global or supra national bloc where a common set of laws will ensure prosperity of global trade. But, Globalizations resulted in reduction of state power and in some instances the traditional economies with its own modes of employment were adversely affected leading to economic disparities and a sense of insecurity within societies. The declining capacity of the state to provide social and economic security for its citizens and a threat perception of exposure to foreign cultures has led to the fundamentalist reactions in the form of aggressive nationalism. Although 'nationality' is commonly comprehended as a derivative of 'nation', it can be described as an ethnic or cultural minority within a nation representing the majority ethno cultural group. The relationship between globalization and nationalism is somewhat similar to that between nationalism and nationalities within a state or nation. Understanding the aspirations and expectations of minority ethnic groups and communities can go a long way to mitigating the politics of assertion of nationalities within the nation. Similarly, accommodating the principles of co existence without compromising on national aspirations and expectations is necessary for globalization to prosper and co exist with nationalism. Effective governance can destroy the seeds of discontent and prevent the sprouting of fervent fundamentalism in the garb of nationalism and prevent secessionist tendencies of the diverse nationalities within India.
